Italy's Energy Outlook 2025: Progress, Challenges, and Opportunities

Italy enters 2025 with renewed momentum and optimism about its energy transition journey. In 2024, capacity additions reached 7,480 MW-1,685 MW (+29%) higher than in 2023. By December 31, installed renewable capacity stood at 76.6 GW, including 37.1 GW of solar and 13 GW of wind power.

Italy's annual target of 8-10 GW of additional renewable capacity aligns with the European Green Deal and the updated Integrated National Energy and Climate Plan (PNIEC), approved in June 2024. The PNIEC sets ambitious goals of achieving 138 GW of renewable capacity by 2030, including 80 GW from solar PV and 28 GW from wind. Progress is evident in the growth trajectory: 1.5 GW in 2021, 3 GW in 2022, nearly 6 GW in 2023, and over 7 GW in 2024.

In 2024, more utility-scale plants were connected to the national transmission grid, signaling growing momentum for large-scale projects. While this development trend is expected to continue, fewer utility-scale projects are likely to become operational in 2025. This is largely because many projects have been stalled this year, awaiting the incentives provided under the FER X mechanism. Assuming the FER X auctions are launched in the coming months, some construction sites (though not all, as not every stalled project will secure the incentives in the first auctions and some will not secure them at all) are anticipated to begin work by late 2025 or early 2026, with most projects completing by 2027. Another key factor influencing the growth trajectory of large-scale projects is the capacity of EPC contractors to handle the surge of many new projects once they are initiated. As a result, the anticipated slowdown in 2025 for these types of projects should not be interpreted as a structural downturn for the sector. It is reasonable to expect this gap to be addressed between the second half of 2026 and 2027.

Meanwhile, the current regulatory framework-particularly the DL Agricoltura and DM Aree Idonee-is contributing to delays in an already protracted permitting process. This poses a genuine risk of slowing down growth in new investment for permitted projects, which could have noticeable repercussions on installed capacity starting in late 2026.

Storage investments are gaining traction, with record demand for connection requests. Terna's MACSE auctions, expected in Q2/Q3 2025, are poised to drive further growth in storage infrastructure.

Looking ahead, 2025 promises significant opportunities, particularly in battery energy storage systems (BESS) and solar markets, driven by the MACSE and FER X auctions and rising load demand fueled by AI, data centers, and electrification (e.g., heat pumps). However, achieving Italy's renewable potential requires addressing challenges in regulatory frameworks, grid infrastructure, and technology-driven supply chains-critical to achieving the 2050 net-zero target.

The Main Challenges

The Regulatory Framework

Both domestic and international investors have raised concerns about the regulatory bottlenecks introduced by the DL Agricoltura and DM Aree Idonee. These measures add complexity to an already challenging landscape and risk reducing investment flows unless timely revisions are made.

Investors remain willing to commit to Italy, provided the regulatory environment supports long-term investments with clear, consistent rules. Retroactive changes and inconsistencies in the framework undermine Italy's credibility, making a stable, predictable environment essential to maintain investor confidence and meet energy transition targets.

The Political Context

We do not expect political developments, including Donald Trump's re-election, to derail Europe (and Italy's) energy transition. EU regulations, strong climate commitments, and market-driven renewable adoption provide a solid foundation for continued progress, even if delays occur.

The Opportunities

Increasing Energy Demand

Italy's electrification is driving substantial energy demand, fueled by the proliferation of data centers, end-use electrification (e.g., heat pumps), electric mobility adoption, and climate change (e.g., summer air conditioning). The PNIEC targets a renewable-centric energy system by 2030 to meet this demand.

High Revenues from Elevated Energy Prices

Italy's reliance on natural gas imports is expected to keep energy prices relatively high in the near term. Unlike other European markets, Italy is less prone to negative pricing scenarios caused by renewable energy oversupply, offering a relatively stable and favorable outlook for investors. However, the transition from the PUN (national single price) to zonal pricing will align energy prices with the specific conditions of different geographical areas. Regions with high renewable energy penetration, such as Sicily, could see lower prices during periods of peak production. While this shift may benefit the overall system, these same regions-where operators have historically concentrated their investments-could face reduced profitability due to lower prices. This challenge is compounded by the current lack of sufficient storage capacity, which, even as it develops, will require time to meaningfully mitigate the energy prices fluctuations.

Long-Term Remuneration Schemes

Long-term remuneration schemes, such as the MACSE, FER X, and FER 2 decrees, are crucial to catalyzing investments across industry segments. However, delays in implementation have created anticipation among investors awaiting action.

These schemes lower financing risks by ensuring consistent remuneration for projects, making them more attractive to traditional financial institutions. In recent years, banks have adopted a cautious approach, requiring significant guarantees in the absence of robust support mechanisms. The anticipated launch of auctions for BESS, solar, and wind projects, alongside lower interest rates, is expected to re-engage banks, positioning them as key players alongside debt funds in financing Italy's energy transition.

The Focus:

BESS and the MACSE Auctions

As renewable capacity expands, investments in storage and grid infrastructure are crucial to integrating renewables and reducing fossil fuel dependence. Storage, though emerging, is attracting significant interest.

Terna's announcement of the MACSE auction, scheduled for mid 2025, represents a key milestone. Italy's reliance on intermittent renewables like solar and wind necessitates robust storage solutions to ensure grid stability. MACSE is expected to enhance storage infrastructure, integrate renewables further, and create new investment opportunities.

For many investors, MACSE marks their first exposure to storage projects, offering a relatively safe environment to explore this frontier. As adoption accelerates and operators gain confidence in storage technologies, these systems are likely to evolve toward merchant schemes, potentially incorporating innovative solutions beyond traditional batteries.
